Appendix 1

Terms

Direct discrimination means everyone must be treated equally and no one less favourably than another. An example of direct discrimination would be to refuse to promote a person because of their religious belief.

Indirect discrimination means that Wheatley Care must not set criteria, policies, procedures or regulations which disadvantage an individual unjustifiably. An example of indirect discrimination would be a special leave policy which did not allow a same sex partner to take leave to deal with a dependant emergency but allows heterosexual partners to do so.

Associative discrimination means that employees must not discriminate against an individual because they associate with someone who has a protected characteristic. An example of associative discrimination would be a parent of a disabled child being subjected to unpleasant comments about disabled people.

Perceptive discrimination means that employees must not discriminate against an individual because they think that person possess a particular protected characteristic. It is irrelevant whether the person has that protected characteristic. An example of perceptive discrimination would be rejecting a job application submitted by a white man as it has been wrongly assumed that he is black because he has an African name.

Harassment includes actions and behaviour which is intimidating, offensive or distressing to a targeted individual or a witness to the harassment. For example, it would be unlawful to harass a member of staff because he was gay or harass a member of staff because they have a son or daughter who may be gay or lesbian.

Third party harassment relates to individuals who are not employed by Wheatley Care and whose behaviour employees find offensive, intimidating or distressing. Examples of third parties would be visitors, suppliers, contractors, agency workers, service users, customers. An example of third party harassment would be delivery men who are rude or abusive to an employee in relation to a protected characteristic.

Victimisation is where an individual has been treated unfairly because they have made a complaint about discrimination or given evidence relating to a complaint about discrimination. For example, a member of staff who provides evidence to show that a colleague did not receive promotion because she is female, who is then excluded from training unjustifiably.

Discrimination after the working relationship has ended may occur when a reference is requested. An example would be an employer refusing to provide a reference or giving a poor reference because of a person's religion or belief.
